It's not that developers are unable to create installers with flexible silent options, it's that they don't bother to.. I'm talking about administrators that need to easily deploy an application to many desktops with absolutely no user interaction, or people that want to quickly install all of their favorite programs at once, such as from an unattended Windows install disk (see).. Currently, if an application's installer does not allow you to silently set the options you require, it has to be 'repackaged' instead, which means you lose all the logic/checking that was in the installer and just know what files/registries were changed.
